

COVER STORY

The 251/1 model featured a front-facing MG 34 7.92mm machine gun to cover troops and perform offensive operations, as well as a rear-mounted MG 42 7.92mm machine gun.

WEIGHT-BEARER

The 251's unsupported front axle served mainly to bear the weight of the nose armor and the engine. The steering wheel could negotiate only slight turns of up to 20 degrees.

FULL-FRONTAL

An improvement over the A and B models, the Ausf. C's nose plate armor was upgraded to a 34.5mm-thick single piece of steel. This effectively warded off most small arms fire, which could usually penetrate armor of up to 8mm.

OPEN ROSE

Troops rode in an open bed in the rear of the half track. While this provided good sightlines and the ability to fight on the fly, personnel were exposed to exploding ordnance from above.

COME FULL CIRCLE

For wide turns, the 251's driver would slow the inside track while keeping the outer track at full power. This proved effective on most terrains, but Americans who faced the Germans in North Africa reported the half track had trouble maneuvering in the desert's soft sands.
