Abstract: Scholarship on the decade-long rule of Alberto Fujimori emphasizes the surprising popularity and support for Fujimori's rule. This essay, which analyzes the political strategy of fear in Fujimori's Peru, suggests that this success is a partial product of the nature of Fujimori's authority. Drawing on a Gellnerian concept of a conceptualization of power, it explains how a certain coherence in a consensus made possible by manipulating fear and engaging a self-blame of order in a context of economic and social uncertainty, and collective responsibility, increases the costs of this insecurity in the economic and political violence of the 1980s and 1990s, explains how the state has used the Fujimori regime to manipulate fear and insecurity in the political arena. This essay also analyzes the existing studies on the political and social aspects, which point to economic factors, such as the economic crisis of the 1980s and neoliberal reforms, to explain civil society's support for the government's policies. The author also analyzes the political factors that contributed to the support, particularly their to the government of state apparatuses, control and intimidate civil society.

On the night of July 27, 2000, the vice president of Alberto Fujimori's third inauguration as president of Peru, seated in a chair throughout the country, was arrested and detained in downtown Lima, challenging what they argued was an illegitimate electoral process. According to the 1993 constitution, which Fujimori and his allies in Congress put in place after the famous infamous self-coup of April 1992, a sitting president could be re-elected only once in a lifetime. This would be Fujimori's third term in office.
