

assessing your space and choosing a location

The first step in planning a kitchen garden is to determine the space you have to work, checking the light and otherwise evaluating its strengths and weaknesses. Almost any place can work, but some spots are certainly better than others. Gardening outdoors is obviously preferable, but even if you're in an apartment without a yard, you have options. There are all sorts of ways to work around small spaces and partial shade, and it's always better to have and work in the most sunny, "facing to the sun" spot. For more, consider the following factors when assessing your space and choosing a location.

CLIMATE

Where you live determines your climate, and your climate determines what you can grow. If you live in Miami, you'll have a hard time growing cool-season vegetables like broccoli, cauliflower, and kale. If you live in Minneapolis, you might struggle with some warm-season vegetables like eggplant and watermelon. Understanding your climate and matching food crops suited to its conditions will save you a lot of time and effort.

In the United States, you can assess your climate by referring to your state's hardiness zone. There's even an atlas in the United States Department of Agriculture's (USDA) Plant Hardiness Zone Map, which divides the country into zones based on their average annual minimum winter temperature. Zones go from coldest (Zone 1) to warmest (Zone 13), with each zone being 10°F warmer (or colder) in an average winter than the adjacent zone. Hardiness zones help gardeners figure out which plants may do well in their climate. Here in Chicago, I'm in Zone 5, which is considered a cool climate by growing standards.

Although hardiness zones are helpful to regional gardeners, they also have their limitations. For one, hardiness is cold weather is just one factor that affects a plant's health. You also have to take into account summer temperatures, the length of your growing season, the amount and timing of rainfall, and boundary levels. You can't overestimate, which are sources specific to your garden, are another important factor to consider. Even in the smallest garden, variations in conditions can occur from one corner of your plot to another. An area protected by a shed or fence, house, or other buildings, for example, will have a very different microclimate than an open area facing south. Gardeners can create artificial microclimates by installing greenhouses, cold frames, and cloches to create warmth in their gardens or to extend the growing season into the cooler months of the year.

SUNLIGHT

Most garden vegetables need a lot of direct sunlight—at least six to eight hours per day. Finding the best location requires figuring out just how much direct sunlight a given area gets. Check on your chosen garden spot at various times throughout the day, and keep a record of how much time the area spends exposed to direct sunlight, dappled light, or shade.
