

Life cycle of the guinea worm

7. In two weeks the larvae undergo two molts within the water flea to become third-stage larvae, which can infect humans.

6. Water flea consumes worm larvae, which resist digestion.

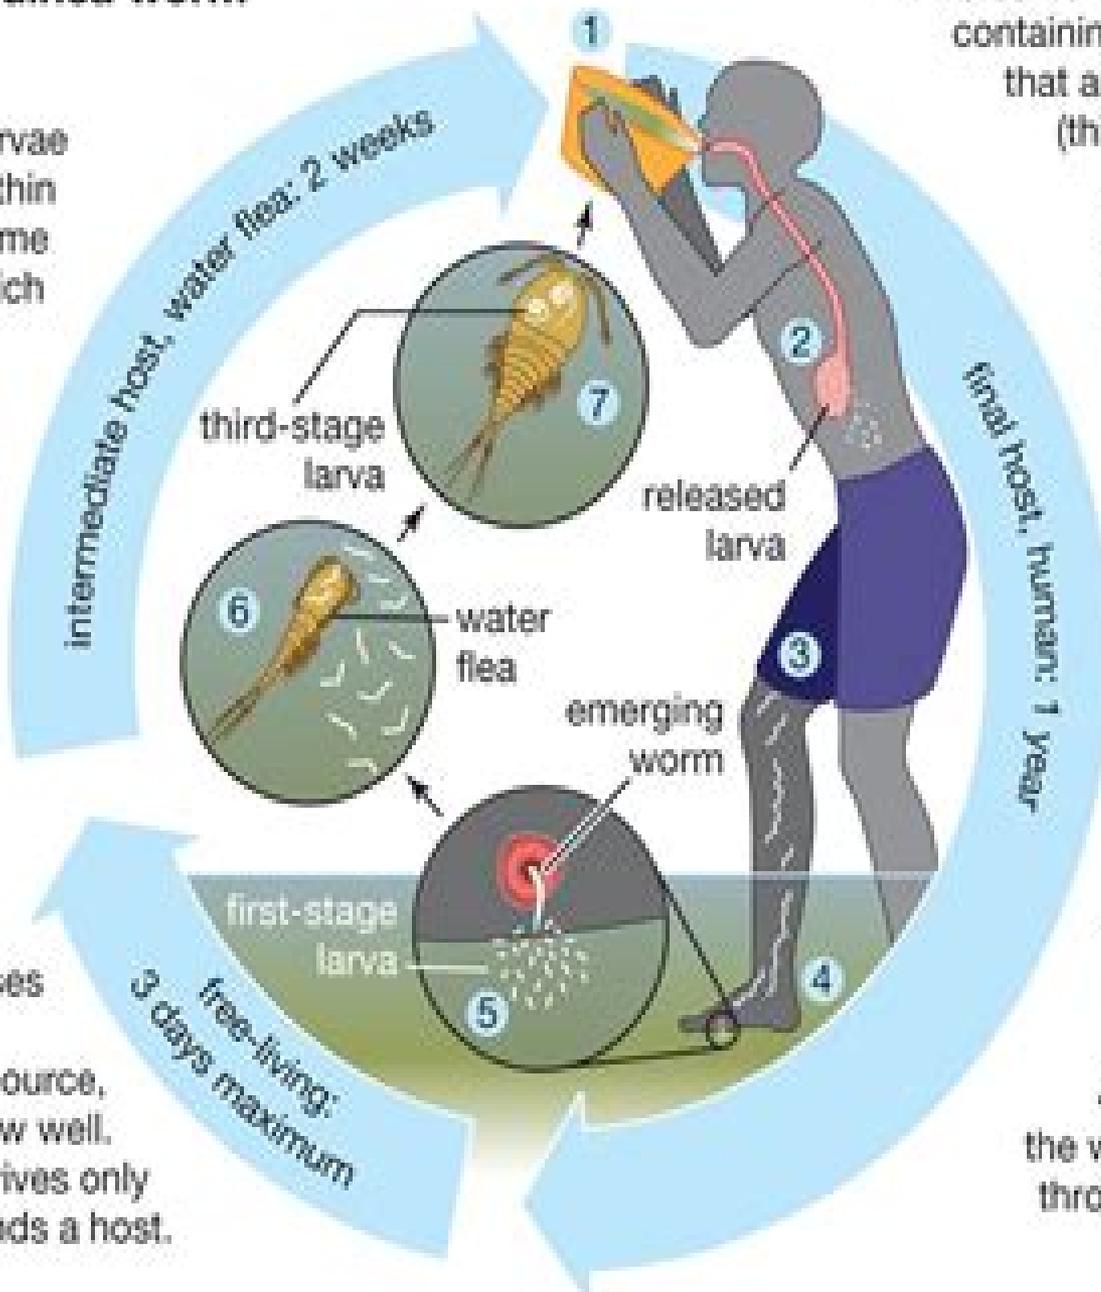

5. On contact with water the emerging worm releases immature (first-stage) larvae into the water source, often a pond or shallow well. A free-living larva survives only three days unless it finds a host.

1. Person drinks well or pond water containing water fleas (Cyclops) that are infected with mature (third-stage) worm larvae.

2. Gastric juices in the human stomach digest the water fleas. Worm larvae are released and move to the abdominal tissues, where they grow and mate.

3. Fertilized female worms migrate to various body regions, usually the lower limbs. (Males die soon after mating.)

4. A year after infection the worm begins to emerge through the skin at the site of a painful blister.
