ABSTRACT.

Automatic train control (ATC) is a general class of the train protection systems for railways that involves a speed control mechanism in response to external inputs. For example, a system could affect an emergency brake application if the driver does not react to a signal at danger. The ATC systems tend to integrate various cab signalling technologies and they use more granular deceleration patterns in lieu of the rigid stops encountered with the older automatic train stop (ATS) technology. The first part of the package of an ATC system is Automatic Train Protection (ATP), where the train is given a Limit of Movement Authority (LMA). This is based on the train's current speed, its braking capability and the distance it can go before it must stop. On a manually driven train, the driver manages this through a combination of route and stock knowledge and the visual data received from wayside signals. On the automated train, the data for the LMA is transmitted from the track to the train where the on-board computer registers the current speed and calculates the target speed that the train must reach and by when. This is electronically plotted in the form of a braking curve. If the train is allowed to exceed the profile of the curve, the brakes will automatically apply to bring the train to a stand. The second part of an ATC is Automatic Train Operation (ATO). This is the driving part of the operation. Looking at a manually driven train, we will see that the driver initiates the starting of the train, allows its acceleration to the permitted speed, slows it where necessary for speed restrictions and stops at designated stations in the correct location.
