

ASSOCIATED SPECIES

In any given habitat, most eucalypt species grow in association with other eucalypt species. For example, Red Bloodwood grows with Scribbly Gum on Hawkesbury Sandstone. Forest Red Gum with Grey Box on the Cumberland Plain, Spotted Gum with Grey Ironbark or Blackbutt on Narrabeen slopes. If you recognise one species, look it up in the book to get the names of associated species, then refer to the pages for each of them to check their identity.

Monotypic stands do occur, however. For example, you may find large areas of Spotted Gum, with no other eucalypt species in sight.

Some eucalypt species grow only in one plant community. Others may appear in entirely different forms if they are able to grow in different communities. Mallees are small and shrubby, with several trunks, and are restricted to woodland or heathland; trees in woodland tend to have low spreading branches and are often twisted or leaning. In contrast, trees in open forest have tall, straight trunks and ascending branches, and are spaced more closely than in the woodland. If the trees exceed 30 metres in height, the community is called a tall open forest.
