

Electric and Magnetic Interactions

Name: _____

Class: _____

Passage A: Forces Working Together

Electric and magnetic forces are deeply connected and often interact. We know that an electric current (moving charges) creates a magnetic field. We can use this to our advantage. An electromagnet is a perfect example. By wrapping a wire around an iron nail and connecting the wire to a battery, we create an electric current. This current produces a magnetic field in the coil, which magnetizes the nail. The nail now acts as a magnet and can pick up paperclips. When the battery is disconnected, the electric current stops, the magnetic field disappears, and the nail is no longer a magnet. This simple device shows a direct interaction where electricity is used to create a controllable magnetic force.

Multiple Choice:

1. What does an electric current create?

- A) A gravitational field
- B) A magnetic field
- C) Static electricity
- D) A stronger current

2. What happens to an electromagnet when the electricity is turned off?

- A) It gets stronger
- B) It reverses its poles
- C) It loses its magnetism
- D) It becomes a permanent magnet

Answer the Following:

3. What are the basic parts of a simple electromagnet?

4. How does the electromagnet demonstrate an interaction between electricity and magnetism?

5. Why is an electromagnet more useful in some situations than a regular magnet?
