

Pain as the Fifth Vital Sign

Jayarami Premkumar

The experience of pain is complex, involving, emotional and cognitive components. Pain is subjective and highly individualized. Carr and Cousins describe pain as the personal, predicted physiological response to an adverse chemical, thermal or mechanical stimuli associated with surgery, trauma or an acute illness & thus characterize it as a sensory response.

The International Association for the Study of Pain (IASP) defines pain as an unpleasant sensory & emotional experience associated with actual or potential tissue damage. According to Katz & Melzack, pain is a personal and subjective experience that can only be felt by the sufferer. This view is also supported by Melzack's definition in which pain is whatever the experiencing person says it is & exists whenever he/she says it does.

Types of Pain

There are various types of pain:

- Acute pain is of recent onset & short duration and is usually associated with an injury to the body. The pain is described as sharp, fast or pricking & is localized to a particular area. Acute pain subsides as healing occurs.
- Chronic pain is prolonged, lasting for months or more.
- Cutaneous (Superficial pain) is characterized by an abrupt onset & a sharp stinging quality depending on the type of nerve fiber involved. It tends to be localized.

- Deep somatic pain is poorly localized and may produce numbness, & may be associated with sweating & blood pressure changes.
- Visceral pain refers to pain coming from body organs. This pain tends to be diffuse, poorly localized, vague and dull. Often visceral pain is manifested as sweating, restlessness, nausea, pallor & agitation.
- Referred pain is felt at an area distant from the site of the stimulus. It occurs when nerve fibers serving an area of the body distant from the site of the stimulus pass in close proximity to the stimulus. The referred pain sensation may be intense, and may be like or no pain at the point of maximum stimuli.
- Neuropathic pain is caused by damage or injury to nerve fibres in the periphery or by damage to the central nervous system.
- Phantom pain is felt in a body part that is no longer present such as amputated feet. It is thought that stimulation of a severed dendrite rather than the stimulation of usual receptors causes the individual to perceive the pain in the removed part.

Despite substantial advances in the knowledge of acute pain mechanisms and in its treatment, acute pain is generally not effectively treated. The reasons for inadequate pain management are:

- Inadequate knowledge of available resources.
- Inadequate assessment in rest and moving.
- Lack of communication between staff and patients.
- Divergent attitudes.
- Absence of systematic recordings.
- Lack of public awareness on pain management.
- The common idea that pain is merely a symptom and not harmful in itself.
- The mistaken impression that analgesic makes accurate diagnosis difficult or impossible.
- Fear of the potential risk for addiction to opioids.
- Concerns about respiratory depression and other opioid-related side effects such as nausea and vomiting.
- Lack of appreciation of variability in analgesic response to opioids.
- Prescriptions for opioids include the use of inappropriate doses and dose intervals.
- Thinking that patient weight is the best predictor of opioid requirement and that opioids must not be given more than 4 hourly.
- Patients difficulties in communicating their need for analgesia.

A patient's reaction to pain is intrinsically personal and accounts for the great variability in pain experience from person to person. Numerous factors like physiological, psychological, sociocultural, and personal beliefs may contribute to this variability from nociception to transcription. The
